The implications of this vote are immediate: concern over President-elect Joe Biden's ability to get his Cabinet picks approved diminishes in a Senate controlled by his party. The results of the Georgia races also complete a trifecta: on Donald Trump's watch, the Republican Party has lost the White House and control over both houses of Congress. Georgia Democrats, having defeated Trump in that state two months ago, showed that their ability to marshal statewide majorities was not a fluke but, potentially, a harbinger of the state's—and the nation's—electoral future. Most notably, Mitch McConnell, the most prolific obstructionist in modern American politics, will no longer hold the position of Majority Leader of the Senate.

But these points were overshadowed by the bizarre, dangerous, and insurrectionary actions that began to unfold at 2 p.m., when throngs of Trump supporters, amped by his reckless tweets and by his wild exhortations at a "Save America" rally he held that morning—and abetted by thirteen Republican senators who had chosen to indulge the President's most delusional musings—stormed the United States Capitol, to prevent a vote certifying Joe Biden's Electoral College victory. Despite years of clear and persistent evidence, it was likely not until that moment that the Republican Party fully realized that Trump's motivating
